License Is the Main Item in About Forty Localities Where Balloting Is Always Close on This Issue.

This is town meeting day in about 250 towns in Massachusetts, and it is seldom that so many questions of general im-portance have been raised for decision in many of the towns.

Annexation with Boston comes up for an expression of the voters in several tocalities, while in others the citizens will vote on proposals to secure their own water supply and the installation of improved fire fighting apparatus.

Encouragement of Improvements in Service, Efficiency and Facilities the Purpose of His Plan.

NEW YORK-In order to make the railway systems of the country pay full value to investors, Louis D. Brandeis of Boston, in an argument before the federal railroad securities commission today, advocated a new government department.

He would establish a bureau of railroad costs and an experimental station in railroad economies

The work of this bureau would be pubished, as are agricultural reports at present, for the benefit of the railroad management. This would not only promote omy, in his opinion, but would bring to the front labor and protective inventions which cannot now be exploited because the inventors cannot dispose of heir inventions.

Conversation, songs and instrumental music on the graphophone have been flashed from the Harvard College station in Jefferson to the stations of the members where it was said to be reproduced with absolute clearness.

By using electric current of high frequency alternation in connection with wireless telephony, distances up to 40 miles have been negotiated successfully. About the same amount of electrical telephony of electrical successfully.

The establishment of any rule fixing a maximum return on capital invested in railroads would tend to prevent efficiency by placing a limit on efficiency. "Efficiency is returned in large net earnings. The public interest, as well as justice, demands therefore the due appreciation of greater efficiency in management, and some method must be found of determining the degree of efficiency attained and of providing adequate reward. THE possibility of a person in a Minnesota city, for instance, having a cluster of fresh flowers desivered to a friend in Rome, or to one who is traveling in South Africa, is one of the space destroying inventions of today. In all of the big cities there are florists who announce, "flowers delivered to all parts of the world," and they make good what they say. They have connections with other large florists everywhere and by means of the telegraph, the cable and the post are able to carry out expeditiously and satisfactorily your plan to brighten some day for a far-away friend with any kind of a flower or flowers you may decide upon. Advertising and Commerce

Advertising has come to be and in the future increasingly is going to be the one great motive power of commercial activity and extension. Advertising is in its infancy. As against the possibilities, it might be said that commercial growth is yet in its infancy. And advertising which is going to bring commercial interests into vigorous manhood, will in such effort grow stronger and stronger itself.

Unreasoning opposition against advertising has taken its proper place with many traditions of the dead past. The question today with the successful business enterprise is how much more ought to be spent this year over the big appropriation of last year.

One difficulty in getting the best returns from advertising lies in a lack of sufficient knowledge on the advertiser's part of what a newspaper can give him or actually has to offer.

At all-times the Monitor, and increasingly so, is the right medium for the advertiser who has some-thing necessary, useful or luxurious and places his reputation behind his offerings and aims to guarantee satisfaction to his customers. That's the kind of ad-

ENDING OF CONGRESS HALTS EFFORTS FOR MEDICAL LEGISLATION

Mann Bill, Which Got Through the House, Fails to Pass the Senate as Part of Appropriation Acts.

WILL RENEW FIGHT

WASHINGTON - With the adjournment on March 4 of the Sixty-first Congress there ended for the time being a campaign for some form of federa; health regulation, which was waged unremittingly during both sessions of that Congress.

The Mann bill finally got through the House, despite the objections which had been urged against it and was only prevented from being attached to one of the big appropriation bills in the Senate by reason of the fact that it was new legislation, and therefore would have to come up as a separate measure. The 'new legislation" objection arose from the fact that the bill created new offices and widened the duties of the public bealth and marine hospital service.

In the next Congress the fight will be Taken up again, for the proponents of this legislation, having been partially successful at this time, will renew the Leabne for Medical Freedom will contime its opposition. In all probability the army. the question of whether the federal government is to extend its control over the public health will be decided during the two years. In the preliminary skirmishes of the Sixty-first Congress the friends of the medical legislation had somewhat the better of the case.

The advocates of medical legislation included the American Medical Association, which is the official body of the ton fishing schooner Mattakeseit, 'ying drainage, lands and public uses, and Abraham Lincoln.

WESTERN RAILROADS ACCEPT FINDING OF

WASHINGTON - Following a conference of railroad presidents at the interstate commerce commission today, it was announced that every railroad in the West had submitted to the decision of the commission in the great rate cases and agree to cancel all their attempted increases of freight rates.

The Chicago & Northwestern filed nev schedules killing every objectionable tariff. The Chicago, Burlington & Quincy made official cancellation of some of its schedules and announced that the remainder would be disposed of tomorrow. The other roads promised that revised schedules would be sent to the commission before March 10.

A interesting account is published in the Journal des Debats, Paris, on the question as to who was really the architect of the charteau of Chambord, and in fact to whose genius is due all those wonderful monuments of architecture found on the banks of the Loire. It would appear probable in spite of much difference of opinion that the greater part of Chambord owes its existence directly or indirectly to the influence of one Duminique de Cortone, known as the "Bocador," who it seems was a pupil of the celebrated Italian architect San Giuliano.

It is recorded that Dominique purchased a house at Blois in the year 1513, where he lived for 18 years; also that where he lived for 18 years; also that requested the necessary authority to sons have remained faithful to the ideas he was employed as architect by Charles sell the estate. New Russian Opportunities

WHEN Nicholas II. brought the nations together for the first Hague conference the Czar of Russia unquestionably convinced the world of his earnestness. There is little doubt that it was the reading of Jean de Bloch's "Future of War" which inspired the Russian monarch to strive for international arbitration; and while there have been occurrences within the empire, and without, which have pointed in directions not always the most pacific, the Czar of all the Russias has given evidence that he is an ardent supporter of peace advocates and peace literature, and that he hopes to make war less and less of an attraction to the nations. Prof. W. I. Hull's work, "The Two Hague Conferences," shows that the last meeting was a decided advance on the preceding one. If the third Hague conference brings still further results, the nations are bound to remember that Emperor Nicholas initiated the movement.

Without minimizing the importance of friendly relations between the powers, the imperial Russian rescript, just made public, should mean to Russia as much, if not more, than international amenities. Emperor Nicholas desires to complete the work of his grandfather for the emancipation of the serfs. To make the peasants land owners on a larger scale than at present, is the brief word from St. Petersburg. Here is an opportunity which may prove epochal to the vast empire. Establishing peace at home, making real farmers of millions who heretofore have not had the chance, lifting one of the heaviest real burdens from the shoulders of the government is now, apparently, the wish of the Emperor, who must have followed the land question in other countries and who wants to profit by the dearly bought experiences of others.

Except for certain conditions based, perhaps, on national characteristics, the land problem of Russia is the land problem elsewhere. Unreasonable landlordism has been the depressing experience of Germany, Great Britain, Scandinavia, the United States, in fact. Other nations may have made greater progress in the matter of subdividing landed properties. But it should be remembered that as early as the time of Alexander I. the abolition of serfdom was begun. Beginning with 1858, Alexander II. freed the serfs on the imperial estate.

The reign of Alexander III., one of the most disturbing periods in modern Russian history, did not benefit the peasants because internal conditions prevented carrying onward the plans of the former Czar. But when Nicholas came to the throne he took up the work where his grandfather had left it. Criticism may be justified in pointing out defects in the rule of the present Emperor, but it would seem as if he did much in 1907 by transferring 4,500,000 acres of crown lands to the Peasants Bank, to be sold on easy terms.

The fact that the peasants are now at liberty to leave their communes and are to have the benefit of agricultural instruction must be considered as of the highest educational importance to Russia. It is only necessary to follow the proceedings in the Duma to become convinced that for the first time in Russian history the government and the peasants are getting close to each other. There is hardly another great country which is not better equipped than Russia from the agricultural standpoint, and this in spite of the fact that the soil of European Russia is equal to the best. Scientific farming and the land divided into small holdings will spur on the people as never before. Other nations will also reap some benefit from the agricultural education now in prospect. The international question may be a vital one to the empire, but the Czar has shown good judgment in bringing forward his peasant plan at a time when it may well be said that economic charity begins at home. In the proportion that education is diffused among the masses wars must cease and peace prevail.

THE transition seems so easy that maybe some will not notice particularly the difference between a party without a President and a President without a party.

THERE is some internationalism in the fact that the American minister to Denmark returns to the United States on a steamer bearing the name of a Swedish monarch.

Compensation for School Trustees

BELIEF that the public has a better right than a private individual, firm or corporation, to expect something for nothing, or to expect that as good service shall be rendered it without as with compensation, is rapidly changing. Even the British Parliament, which has clung to the no-compensation idea tenaciously up to this time, is contemplating the enactment at an early day of a law that will enable its members to draw salaries.

Many cities during recent years have placed the names of their aldermen on the payrolls. Some cities have deemed it wise to increase the salary of their mayors. A good price for efficient service is felt generally among thinking people to be the best means of obtaining good government. Very often priceless service is given gratuitously. Very often the efficiency of an unpaid municipal officer or an unpaid municipal body could not be increased by a money compensation. But, as a rule, the well-paid public servant gives the greater satisfaction. For one thing, he is enabled to bestow more of his thought and time upon the duties of his position or office, and, for another thing, more is expected of him, and rightfully.

The public schools of the larger American cities absorb a very large portion of their revenues. There is no more important department in any American city than that of education. Take New York city. The teaching and supervising force of the schools which provide for the training of 700,000 children there numbers 17,000 persons, and the cost of operating the educational machinery annually is $36,000,000. Yet the members of the New York board of education, like the members of similar boards in all the great cities of the country, are unpaid.

Replying to a letter of resignation from James Creelman of the board of education, Mayor Gaynor declares that the management of the schools should be invested in a city department, responsible to the mayor, like the other departments, and that it should have at its head a board, of which the members should have an adequate salary. Other great cities of the country have public school responsibilities and expenditures proportionate with those of New York, and all are relatively as deeply interested in efficient and economical school management. It may not be that many would care to go as far as Mayor Gaynor seems to recommend in the matter of incorporating the school management with the general municipal departments, but several of them are dissatisfied with the unpaid school trustee system, and would doubtless be glad if New York or some other city should succeed in solving the problem of school management along improved lines.

OF COURSE it pays to go to college. Owen Davis, Harvard, '93, has 150 plays to his credit in eighteen years.

Advisory

Council for Greater

ACTIVE opposition to the movement in favor of having an advisory metropolitan council for Greater Boston is being isolated gradually so that lines of division are drawn more clearly between towns favoring a "real Boston" and those which are somewhat unfavorable to the plan. Certain influential people in practically every city and town think that an advisory council would prove an entering wedge for apprecation to munic-people in practically every city and town think that an advisory council would prove an entering wedge for annexation to municipal Boston, while others in the same places are convinced that the best interests of the forty-odd communities in Greater Boston demand that some body be established to promote the welfare of all the municipalities concerned. It is from Newton and Brookline, more than anywhere else, that seemingly inflexible antagonism to the plan has come, while passive opposition has been noted in Hingham, Milton, Hull and Winchester. But underneath these surface indications, even in Newton and Brookline, there are noticeable other signs, outcroppings in numerous quarters of sentiment that is hardly reconcilable with the quoted expressions of certain high civic authorities in these places.

Gradual definition of the situation tends to overcome much of the confusion hitherto surrounding thoughts of a homogeneous Greater Boston. Where the plan is well understood there appears to be deep-rooted approval of the advisory council project. A leading argument used by men who spoke against the idea has been the claim that twenty-eight of the places represented in the council would have the controlling voice in that body. Yet metropolitan affairs are now managed by men three fifths of whom have no connection with the metropolitan district. And, so far as can be determined, nothing but their own consent ever would deprive the affected municipalities of autonomy. This apprehension as to annexation is disappearing rapidly, we are informed, but advocates of the council plan doubtless would find it worth while to reassure every one that the making of a "real Boston" does not mean loss of self-government.

The chief difficulty thus far encountered by the Chamber of Commerce in its campaign for an advisory council has been general apathy. Members of the chamber explain this situation on the ground that there is no moral issue involved, and active enthusiasm is lacking because people fail to take sides strongly in the matter. Still, if a direct vote were taken in all of the different communities tomorrow, it is not improbable that the rank and file of the citizens would go on record in favor of the "real Boston" plan. The Chamber of Commerce's bill providing for an advisory council of municipal chief executives in the cities and towns, without annexation to Boston, means a population of 1,423,400. It will be introduced soon as a substitute for the Bennett measure, and no unreasonable feeling should prevent the proposed act from receiving the thorough hearing that it seemingly deserves. Greater Boston as a whole cannot afford, it would seem, to ignore its own convictions in this matter while waiting upon a few communities which do not see the advantages of district unity. Cooperation among five sixths of the municipalities affected ought to help the minority to determine whether floating with the tide in this instance would not benefit the entire metropolitan social and business structure.

National Orange Show WITH the first national orange show ever held in the United States, the Californians will endeavor this week to convince the world that in their golden climes the citrus crop flourishes to best advantage. All California will be interested in the exhibits at San Bernardino, and orange dealers all the way from Fresno to Los Angeles will flock into the little hill town down toward the Mexican border line to teach or to learn something about the globose fruit which in late years has become so prominent as an article of food or refreshment. There has been a noticeable increase in California's orange crop, and Florida no longer can plume herself on the strength of first honors, to which the Golden state is building up a very fair claim. Meanwhile, Arizona, although handicapped by a later start, is striving with might and main to catch her neighbor to the west in the race for orange-growing supremacy.

Little do easterners ordinarily care whether oranges are of the common variety, the bitter or Seville or the Bergamot, so long as the fruit is plump, reddish yellow, sweet and juicy. Even the expert growers of the gulf states and the West seldom attempt to trace citrus genealogy back to the China species or the bigarade. It is not regarded as highly important that Risso and Poiteau described some eighty varieties of orange chiefly differing in shape, size and flavor. An American eats his oranges with just as much gusto if he does not inquire into their antecedents. But even the orange consumer would enjoy rhapsodizing over aromatic displays, tastefully arranged on a large scale; he might learn something from observing the exhibits representing industries akin to orange-growing, like boxmaking, packing, cooling, refrigerating and preparing for transportation. All these things doubtless will be seen at San Bernardino.

If America and Europe are not convinced by next week that the Golden state raises better oranges than ever came out of China, Japan, India or the Mediterranean countries, it probably will not be the fault of the Californians. Besides encouraging the orange-growing industry of the Southwest, the San Bernardino show may have a tendency to stir interest enough among planters in the gulf states to make them promote a similar exhibition.

Just how many thousands of dollars were lost by popular lecturers who are representatives and senators in Congress by reason of President Taft's call two years ago for an extra session to revise the tariff will probably never be known, for neither the eloquent and interesting gentlemen who were compelled to absent themselves from the Chautauqua platforms through the early weeks of summer, nor the Chautauqua managers who were compelled to disappoint their agers who were compelled to disappoint their audiences, are willing even now to talk about the matter save in a rather distant and non-committal way.

Nevertheless, it is widely understood that among the greatest losers at that time was the Hon. Joseph G. Camon. The patrons of Chautauqua gatherings were particularly desirous of seeing and hearing the noted speaker, but the duties of his exacting office literally tied him to his chair, and every day the House remained in session after the Chautauqua throngs began to gather meant a loss of two or three hundred dollars to him. He was not alone, however; the leading standpatters and insurgents in both houses were nearly all under contract to address the summer gatherings; and in a majority of cases these contracts had to be canceled owing to the difficulty experienced by the statesmen in agreeing upon schedule K or some other point involved in downward or upward revision.

The Hon. Champ Clark of Missouri was responsible for a great deal of this delay, personally and as the minority leader in the House. The demand for him was not nearly so great in Chautauqua circles in 1909 as it became in 1910, and not comparable at all with what it is now. He did not, therefore, feel the call of the uplift, so to speak, as keenly as did the man whom he was even then hoping to supersede. He could smile at Speaker Cannon when the latter urged haste, and, knowing the situation, it is said that he actually did smile at Mr. Cannon frequently in those trying days.

It has often been said that, in politics, if you only have the patience to wait long enough everything comes around. In the extra session called by President Taft to act on the reciprocity agreement the Hon. Champ Clark of Missouri will be tied down in the speaker's chair as was Mr. Cannon two years ago, while the latter will be a free lance on the floor. It has already leaked out that Mr. Clark is under contract to deliver, next summer, a series of Chautauqua lectures which, if carried out, would net him $9000. Other leading Democrats and many insurgents are also under contract. Whether Mr. Cannon and his standpatter friends have been much sought after by the Chautauqua managers this year is not known, but their fees would be lower as a consequence of the results of the election of last November, and they will have less to lose by a long extra session. It is now Mr. Cannon's turn to smile from the floor at Mr. Clark in the chair, especially when the latter is using his gavel vigorously and urging the House to expedite

The whole tone of an interview granted by a popular author recently to a representative of a New York newspaper is calculated to impress the non-literary person with the fact that when one who is born to the craft gets well into the harness as a writer it is no trouble at all to throw off five or ten or twenty or fifty or eighty thousand words on order or speculation. The author in question tells of not only writing hundreds but thousands of short stories. In addition to considerable production in this line, and regardless of the fact that he gives six months of every year to travel, he has been averaging one complete volume a year for the past decade. This is not extraordinary.

His novels sell well, among the best in fact. They are fair average novels of the period. Those who like them, like them. Those who like something better have, perhaps, never heard of them. As much might be said with regard to the present-day output of fiction in general. It is not work that lingers, like Scott's or Hugo's or Thackeray's or Dickens' or Hawthorne's or J. Fennimore Cooper's of Charles Reade's or Wilkie Collins'. It is not fiction that invites a second reading. It creates no long-remembered characters, no long-remembered situations. It is not quoted. First-edition collectors do not crave it, Most of it is doomed to disappear from the catalogues of the public and private circulating libraries before this country has passed the first blush of its youth.

Yet rapid writing is not responsible for this. The majority of good writers are quick thinkers, and their pens or their type-writers keep pace with their thoughts. Scott used to produce manuscript at a marvelous rate. One of his biographers tells how he snatched a sheet that he had finished with his left hand, cast it from him, and was at work upon the next sheet before the first had touched the floor. Dickens handled two novels, wrote short sketches, edited a weekly and acted as stage manager for private theatricals, all at the same time. A novel a year is not an overfast gait. Some excellent novels have been written in three months. It is not the rapidity of production that is altogether accountable for the prevailing mediocrity in fiction. Some lay it to one supposed cause, some to another. Most of the critics blame the writers. The fact is, it is the readers who are responsible. They are too easily pleased. There would be an immediate and noticeable improvement in fiction if only first-class work found ready sale.

There is no lack of capable writers. There is no lack of good material. Given a good writer and good material, a good novel can be turned out easily in a year, providing the novelist works to the end of being included in the list of best writers of his period rather than in the list of best sellers.
